Not only did BBC Two have a different programming model to that of the BBC's main terrestrial channel, it became a truly independent channel and it had to decide how to adapt to that new environment. A bankable hit was seen as essential to survive in the new marketplace. Two very different programmes reflected the new reality - The Monocle, a kind of aspirational documentary, and I, Claudius, with its stellar acting, a new kind of historical series. When Princess Diana died, The Monocle was one of the first programmes to air a portrait of her, with all the BBC's resources at its disposal. With the aid of a new BBC Global Vision, the Corporation became more global in its output but also became more national. The Bankable Hit became key to the survival of the BBC. While the programme makers were highly conscious of the fact that they were writing for the programme, they weren't writing for the audience but for a much wider audience. The feedback to the proposals didn't come from a source so much as from the target audience itself. The BBC didn't know what it was. The Monocle and I, Claudius changed that landscape. They became the first television programme to sell itself to a national audience. We knew that we were writing for the first time in over a decade, with the aid of computers, social media and a much increased resource base. This not only changed the way that television was made but the way that television was bought. The Monocle, for example, wasn't only supported by the BBC, it's audience was in the millions and was supported f678ea9f9e
